

The only time it should be legal to shut down a wireless network is when it is necessary to do so to repair a defect, or when it is necessary to prevent an attack that is compromising the ability of the network to function. The government and government agencies are not wise enough to judge any other scenario in which one might think about shutting down a network.